Diana Litzenberg, a mother and a wife, was one of the many hundreds of people having a good time at the Las Vegas Concert. But then everything changed when the bullets came raining down like acid rain. Litzenberg hid underneath the bleachers but when she saw a young woman hit with a bullet she courageously went to help the young woman. But while doing so a man rammed onto her face and she fell down unconscious. Her limp body was trampled on by many frantic concertgoers as they tried to dodge the bullets. She woke up the next day lying on a hospital bed with no feelings of the left side of her body. The road to recovery has been difficult for her. Anything that reminds her of that fateful night unsettles her. Hundreds of miles away from the place she calls home and thousands of dollars in medical bills, she just wants to forget everything and return to the life she had before. Her daughter described her mother as being happy and an outgoing person but now after the shooting Litzenberg is afraid of everything and a smile on her face is rare. Litzenberg is just one of many people impacted by the shooting. For Litzenberg there is no clear date as to when she can leave the hospital and the memories of that night behind and start a new life.
